Napa, Calif., September 27, 2017—di Rosa Center for Contemporary Art is proud to present its first institution-wide exhibition comprised of new commissions and guest-curated projects utilizing work from the permanent collection. Unfolding in two parts from November 4, 2017, through 2018, Be Not Still: Living in Uncertain Times addresses concerns of the present social and political climate through eight large-scale and ambitious artist-led inquiries. These projects offer viewers multiple lenses through which to reflect on and engage with prescient matters affecting our local and global communities. Central to Be Not Still is an extensive education and civic engagement roster, including community partnerships and artist-centered programming, to provide multiple opportunities for visitors to interact with the exhibition throughout its run.

Part 1 of Be Not Still is anchored by the selected topics and projects of each of the exhibition’s participants—Dodie Bellamy & Kevin Killian (Surveillance), Ala Ebtekar (Citizenship) Rigo 23 (American Exceptionalism) and Allison Smith (The Rise of White Nationalism)—which are presented to open a conversation around our contemporary moment. “The power of the artists’ projects coupled with the impact of compelling educational experiences, allow us to show why art and artists matter,” di Rosa Executive Director Robert Sain states.
organized by curator amy owen and assistant curator kara q. smith, with andrea saenz williams, director of education and civic engagement, be not still is the inaugural exhibition under the newly renamed di rosa center for contemporary art, emphasizing the organization’s renewed focus on artist-driven collaborations. the ambitious exhibition came together through a series of internal dialogues examining how to bring new relevance to the permanent collection and support artists working in the bay area by providing platforms for experimentation while also being critically and socially engaged with the local community and the world at large. “if ever there was a time that the world needed artists, it is now,” owen states. “their visionary creativity and ability to imagine new ways of thinking about the most pressing issues of our day are essential to society.”

the organization is also making an institutional commitment to thought-provoking programs and to civic engagement. “we believe that engaging the public in dynamic and creative ways is essential to a thriving center for contemporary art,” saenz williams states. as a result, di rosa will present a wide array of new programs in conjunction with the exhibition including a series of artist talks, a symposium addressing the issues explored in the first rotation of the exhibition, and a book club. “we want to provide audiences with programming that is innovative, thoughtful, evocative, and relevant.”

for this phase of the exhibition, di rosa is partnering with the boys & girls clubs of napa valley and napa valley college theater arts to provide a platform for students to engage with the art and themes of be not still. additionally, relationships with community resources for children, napa valley unified school district, napa bookmine, the napa public library, and sonoma state university, as well as outreach efforts across the bay area are taking place to further the organization’s mission of providing inspiring experiences with contemporary art of northern california.

be not still: living in uncertain times part i — artist projects

dodie bellamy & kevin killian - surveillance aligning with rene di rosa’s own history as a writer and journalist, san francisco-based authors dodie bellamy and kevin killian mine di rosa’s permanent collection to explore the theme of surveillance in there’s a dark secret in me: precarity, exposure, camouflage. the project, on view in gallery 1, highlights works that evoke a sense of unease, danger, and foreboding through imagery, mood, or form, and reveals the collection’s prescient ability to foreshadow the present moment. as bellamy and killian state, “amid the upheaval of a divided nation, we all feel vulnerable and uncertain.”

ala ebtekar - citizenship
primarily known for his work in painting and drawing, di rosa collection artist ala ebtekar tests the possibilities of clay in a new ceramic floor installation responding to the theme of citizenship and our shared humanity. The artist transfers a field image from the Hubble Space Telescope onto an immersive tile grid using a cyanotype photographic process. Transposing this cosmic tapestry to clay marries the sky with the earth, simultaneously harkening celestial geometric patterns found in Persian mosque architecture and the rich history of experimental ceramic artistic practice in Northern California. Viewers gaze downward to find no visible distinctions between stars, planets, space, or time, participating in a universality of existence and exploring what it means to be a territory without borders.

Allison Smith - The Rise of White Nationalism
Building on past projects that explore the role of craft in the construction of national identity, Allison Smith debuts a series of sculptural installations investigating the rise of white nationalism and how what we call 'patriotism' might be viewed, from various perspectives, in a different light. The artist anchors her project through an assembly of cast iron Tiki torches evoking those recently used by white supremacist protesters in Charlottesville, VA. The act of solidifying these charged, menacing objects becomes an exercise in historicizing the present moment as a means to move beyond it. Smith prompts viewers to take current debates on the removal of confederate monuments as a reference point for discussions on the potent materiality of sculpture.

Rigo 23 - American Exceptionalism
Taking our present leadership’s “America First” rhetoric as a point of departure, di Rosa collection artist Rigo 23 presents Madre Tierra (Mother Earth), a large-scale immersive installation that employs an imposing three-dimensional rendering of the American Flag to explore the concept of American Exceptionalism. The artist explores the long-term environmental and human impact our contemporary politics may have on the world at large. The white stripes of the flag emerge as solid walls from a red and blue gallery floor, inviting viewers to walk through and around this metaphor for a territory. As our nation is literally building walls around itself, Rigo 23’s powerful installation evokes both the physical and ideological/conceptual boundaries that may come to define us as a country.

PARTNERSHIPS

Boys & Girls Clubs of Napa Valley
This collaboration aims to increase leadership skills for teens while addressing issues relevant to their everyday lives through an artist-led project.

Napa Valley College Theater Arts
Led by Jennifer King, Professor of Theater Arts/Performing Arts Coordinator and Artistic Director of Napa Valley College, students will create theater pieces based upon Be Not Still: Living in Uncertain Times. San Francisco theater maker, Mark Jackson will provide an intensive workshop on theater making to generate work that will be developed and performed at di Rosa and at Napa Valley College. The workshop will provide tools and a platform for students to create their own performance pieces based on the works and topics explored in the exhibition.

Additional outreach efforts with community-based organizations and local businesses include relationships with Community Resources for Children, Napa Valley Unified School District, Napa Bookmine, the Napa Public Library, and Sonoma State University.
